General Considerations. -- Where a supply of electrical energy can be purchased, it seldom pays to lay down private plant, for the reasons given in 330. Where power is purchased certain considerations come into the case that are absent where the installation is self-contained. Thus, as explained in 187, faulty insulation may endanger other installations than the one in which it occurs; and the legitimate use of the power may interfere with the supply of energy to other consumers (329). Then, again, with a private installation it makes comparatively little difference to the total expenditure if a few lights are left burning when not required; the extra fuel used could hardly be detected; and it makes no difference at all for what purpose the energy is being used. Where, on the other hand, energy is purchased, it all has...
