Not illustrated. 1867 Excerpt: .usually aim to buy, to the benefit of the people, the articles best adapted to their wants, with, in proportion to origin, or place of growth or production; and to the best price to be obtained, to whoever will buy. It is less an enthusiast upon the subject of home industry, to buy a poorer article at the same price as a better one, merely because it was made or grown in his own country, than it is to buy a better one, if the world could suddenly take the measure of producing some one article--say grain, or coal, or iron, or gold--it would in a short time find such a stock on hand, as to be in the main useless, while other and valuable interests; and sources of wealth had been neglected. All exchanges should be based, on the principle of reciprocity. If other people take the measure of producing, we must take...
