Each succeeding lesson is based upon preceding work, and the composition of sentences of all varieties and in longer exercises is required. In Psychology the instruction seeks to promote the highest mental development of the students, and to give a clear and accurate knowledge of the general laws and functions of the human mind. Special attention is given to the order of mental development, and to the application of psychological laws to the mastery and presentation of knowledge. The aim is to guide the best use of the students own powers, to inculcate the intellectual sympathy indispensable to successful instruction, and to show the relation and adaptation of knowledge to the various stages of the minds development. In History the Seminary Method is used, so far as means are at hand. The student is introduced, so far as possible, to the originals in art, government, literature, and c. ; by a series of questions the picture of the original is developed in the mind, and the comparison made between that and the present. The philosophy of Arithmetic is made prominent-in its analytical, synthetical and comparative functions. The method pursued looks to the development of rules by close reasoning upon the given data. The why, rather than the how, is made of paramount importance. Special attention is given to primary work....
