In the last 12 months there were a record number of E85 pumps installed nationwide, 440. At this rate, as you indicated, it would take at least a century to reach critical mass in E85 infrastructure. The current rate of infrastructure deployment is therefore insufficient to support the national vision of domestic biofuels production, deployment, and use that is consequential within the decade. The Department believes that an E85 delivery system is an important goal of an alternative fuels infrastructure, but should not necessarily be the exclusive goal upon which our national strategy is built. Intermediate blends may offer an alternative approach to balance fuel production and use in parallel in order to enable continuous, uninterrupted growth in domestic fuels production and allow more outlets into the marketplace. Turning...
