Excerpt: .study of each case as an indimldua.l--a.nd to assist in the utilization and interpretation of the findings so obtained for the elucidation of the particular case as a clinical problem. 2. To be invited to study the obscure case as a whole---not merely as a drop of blood or a specimen of urine--in close and friendly cooperation with the clinical division, and, by virtue of its special knowledge, to suggest, indicate, and initiate particular methods of laboratory examination of possible value as excluding or establishing a possible diagnosis. 3. To maintain close contact with the clinical divisions in order that it may be prepared at all times to intelligently enter into a joint consideration of clinical problems in a consulting capacity. 4. To be prepared and equipped to investigate problems of interest to medicine as a whole. The functions of the pathologist have been admirably summed up by Ewing:3 1. To investigate the causes of fatalities to elucidate the causes of disease and to correct partial or erroneous diagnoses. 2. To keep himself familiar with the literature and progress of the medical sciences. 3. To serve as a consultant in the wards and operating.rooms where, by virtue of his knowledge should be able to bring data with which, as a rule, the clinician is less familiar. 4. To cooperate with the internist in general diagnosis and to serve the surgeon in gross anatomic and physical diagnosis. 5. To supervise the work of the clinical...
