

In-mould Decoration of Plastics (Paperback)

By J.C. Love, V. Goodship

Ismithers Rapra Publishing, United Kingdom, 2002. Paperback. Book Condition: New. 294 x 206 mm. Language: English Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Many plastic components need to have a surface finish applied before use. This can act as a decorative layer, a protective layer, to smooth out surface defects, or to alter surface properties (for example, to enhance adhesion). If this surface effect is applied during the moulding process, it can reduce time, space, material and machinery requirements. It also allows processors to supply complete systems, rather than just moulded components. In-mould decoration techniques include the in-mould application of film, in-mould priming, in-mould labelling and the injection of paints into the mould. In-mould decoration generally requires additional equipment, which can be expensive. Design is also critical for success. These factors need to be taken into consideration in corporate planning. In-mould films are prepared by multi-layer extrusion or solvent casting. They can be single colour or highly patterned with detailed graphics. They are stretched across a mould prior to injection, compression or blow moulding to produce a variety of decorative effects. customer personalisation of products such as cars and mobile phones. Changing design between moulds is as simple as changing...
